Not illustrated. 1810 Excerpt: ...been impelled at length to take the most just in itself, but his majesty rejoices in the consolatory and inestimable assurance that the whole world acknowledges it to be so. The emperors just principles--his detestation of unnecessary wars; his long, but ineffectual efforts to avoid the conflict which has now burst forth, are so notorious; the designs of the enemy are so little concealed and the motives which have called for this final resolution are so decisive, that truth and justice must be banished from the earth, if all free judgments were not Unanimous concerning the origin of this war. The immediate object of his majesty is to put an end to that unnatural and ambiguous state in which Austria during three years has vacillated; a state which under the vain denomination of peace, has involved it in all the sacrifices, burthens, and dangers of the most oppressive war:--and to place the country in a situation which may secure it the honorable repose of a real peace. But such a situation cannot subsist while foreign armies, it matters not under what pretence, are allowed to hold the monarchy in a state of perpetual siege; it cannot subsist while the political and military relations of the States which surround Austria, are of such a quality, that it needs only a single order, a hint from a foreign country, to spread over the whole Austrian frontier the apprehension of hostile incursion; and while seriously intended, or merely illusive movements, or only the threatening proximity of a numerous army, ready to strike, compel the adoption of extraordinary means of defence, and costly armaments. The security of the Austrian Monarchy cannot, therefore, be sought in an insulated state. It cannot be conceived as
