

Botany (Classic Reprint)

Chapter VI.) of seven quite well marked kinds of tissue. In this, however, while not adopting De Bary's classification, I have followed his method of treating the subject, as given in his recent work on the comparative anatomy of plants (Vergleichende Anatomie der Vegetationsorgane der Phanerogamen und Farnpflanzen.) (II.) The second considerable innovation occurs in Part II. ;it consists in raising the Protozoa, Zygomycetes, Oomycetes and Charophytes to the dignity of Primary Divisions of the vegetable kingdom, co-ordinate with the Bryophyta, Pteridophyta and Phanerogamia. The usefulness of both of these departures from the common practice has been subjected to the test of the laboratory, and the lecture and class-room, with the most satisfactory results; and I am led to hope that in the hands of others they may also serve to give a clearer and more accurate notion of the structure of plants. Should they do this they will need no further apology or defense. Of the illustrations, many are entirely new ;many others have been re-drawn, from various sources, with slight modifications, expressly for this work, and all from other sources are specially acknowledged in their places. I desire here to acknowledge my indebtedness to Dr. A. S. G. Ray, whom it is an honor to own as my sometime teacher, for kindly aid and counsel in the preparation of the lectures upon which this work is based ;and in the same way I am indebted to Dr. G. L. Goodale, Dr. W. G. Farlow and Professor A. J. N. Prentiss. For aid in the immediate preparation of the material for the press, acknowledgment is due many of my personal friends :Mr. J. C.
